ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I wish to express my gratitude to various people who made possible the accomplishment of this thesis. First, to my parents and brother that suffered from my absence during a very hard period for my family. To my wife, Silvia, who supported me through this last year and a half; I wish to thank her for her love and generosity. To Fabio DaSilva, my advisor. It was during his Sociological Theory course that the initial paper on alienated labor was written. For his interest, dedication, scholarship and friendship I give him thanks. Grateful acknowledgement is also due to the Kellogg Institute for International Studies and its Director, Guillermo O'Donnell. To Samuel Valenzuela, for his scholarship. Thanks to Irene Vasilachis and Jorge Walter, researchers from the CEIL, Buenos Aires, for their comments and criticisms of an early draft. I also thanks Andrew Weigert, and Eugene Halton, for agreeing to read this thesis. Finally, I thank Dave Brunnsma, for his support and friendship.
